Las Vegas, NV — Reopening has a very different meaning for red-light businesses in Nevada.

Some legal brothels say there's no official guidance on how they should safely get up and running again.

So, the brothels say they came up with their own rules on how to protect workers and customers.

Among the rules, one brothel would cut in half the number of sex workers on site.

Another brothel is also suggesting weekly coronavirus tests for their workers.

At the end of the day, one manager says it all comes down to a risk that people are willing to take.

"This is a choice. This is a choice for a customer to come here, this is a choice for an independent contractor to work here, and I don't think we can take away those choices," said Madam Dena of Sheri's Ranch.

One expert says he's not concerned about the coronavirus being transmitted through sexual contact.

But he says any physical contact, or sharing space with another person, is always a risk.
